

FOOD MATTERS

Ladies' Night

Two weeks ago, the Los Angeles-based artist Zoe Crosher emailed her female friends in the art and food worlds: "Please join us for the inaugural New York City meeting of the Fainting Club." She started the club — so named, she explains, after an encounter she'd had "where a group of incredibly fabulous women all came together to help one of the ladies, who fainted" — in March. This latest dinner party was her first step in expanding the organization outside California. To host the East Coast event, Ms. Crosher teamed up with Julia Sherman, a Brooklyn-based artist who started the culinary blog Salad for President and is known for her Salad Garden on the roof of MoMA PSL. And Ms. Crosher has found women to run chapters in Mexico City, London and Hong Kong. At tmagazine.com, to help inspire similar dinner parties elsewhere, Ms. Sherman shared recipes from the New York meeting, which the women hope will not be the last. CHARLOTTE DRUCKMAN

